A Loan Exhibition
of American Paintings
Since 1900

Howard E. Huse

The William Rockhill Nelson Gallery of Art
Kansas City, Missouri
December, 1933

Foreword

FOR the opening of this new Gallery in the most American city in the United States, it was felt only fitting and proper to make the first loan exhibition a showing of the achievement of the artists of our own country. It has been conceived also as a tribute to the ideals of its founder, Mr. Nelson. The permanent collection contains outstanding examples of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, hence emphasis has been given to those men whose work has been produced since 1900. It is in the searchings and labours of this thirty odd years that we may find the explanation of American art of today.

None can deny but that the greatest influence from 1880 up to the last few years has been overshadowingly French. The predominance of Dusseldorf and Munich gave way to that of Paris in the eighties and even the last remnants of that native Hudson River School succumbed to impressionism. After the Armory Show of 1913, the most conservative of our artists turned momentarily to cubism and abstraction.

The result of this period of experimentation, of an eager, almost avid desire to try the new and the unusual, has been to give to American art a firmer traditional foundation and a wider range of knowledge. There is being produced today, painting and sculpture which is more national than that of any other period in our cultural history, more conscious and characteristic of our life and one which can hold its head high in any company.
